to several sets of data of importance in the field of cancer epidemiology. We hope to present these new statistical methods in such a way that epidemiologists and other research workers without extensive statistical training can appreciate the possibilities they offer and, in many cases, can apply them to their own work.

(6) Applying common statistical methods for inference. (7) Applying descriptive and inferential methodologies according to the type of study design for answering a particular research question. (8) Interpreting results of statistical analyses found in public health studies.

BioStat 523. Statistical Methods for Epidemiology

Statistical methods for nested case-control and case-cohort studies, which have been increasingly used in cancer epidemiology, also are discussed. This chapter is designed for cancer epidemiologists who understand basic statistical methods for commonly used epidemiological study designs and are able to initiate power and sample size calculations.

cancer. In this respect, studies have explored the utility of microarrays in identifying gene expression signatures" with activated or repressed expression profiles in the disease status as potential diagnostic targets (Dhanasekaran et al., 2001, Luo et al., 2001, Welsh et al., 2001). Another example pertains to genomic studies in breast cancer.
